UK VISA ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW

If your UK visa or immigration application has been refused, your leave to enter or remain has been cancelled at the UK border, or you are not satisfied with the period or conditions of leave you have been granted, our administrative review lawyers can advise on the merits of applying for administrative review and, if appropriate, challenge the Home Office decision by way of an application for administrative review.

On this page we look at the difference between an immigration appeal and administrative review (also known as 'admin review' or 'AR'), who has the right to apply for admin review, grounds for administrative review (the meaning of a 'case-working error'), how to apply for administrative review, time limits for applying for administrative review, administrative review processing times and possible outcomes following an application for admin review.

We have separate pages for immigration appeals to the First-tier Tribunal (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/first-tier-tribunal-immigration-appeal/>), Upper Tribunal (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/upper-tribunal-immigration-appeal/>) and Judicial Review (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/immigration-judicial-review/>).

What is Administrative Review?

Administrative review is a process whereby an applicant can challenge a Home Office immigration decision on the ground that it is wrong because it contains one or more case working errors.

Not all Home Office decisions can be challenged by way of admin review. This potential remedy is only available when an eligible decision has been made. (<https://www.google.co.uk/?q=richmond+chambers+in>)
 The only ground for AR is that the Home Office has made a case working error, as defined in the Immigration Rules.

Following an application for admin review, the Home Office will review its decision and, if it agrees that a relevant case working error has been made, correct it.

To discuss your UK visa or immigration refusal with one of our immigration barristers, contact our immigration lawyers on 0203 617 9173 or complete our enquiry form below.

What Is the Difference Between an Administrative Review and an Immigration Appeal?

Administrative reviews and immigration appeals are both mechanisms for challenging visa and immigration decisions of the Home Office.

However, not all visa and immigration decisions carry a right of appeal – and not all visa and immigration decisions can be challenged by way of administrative review. You can only appeal to the First-tier Tribunal (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/first-tier-tribunal-immigration-appeal/>) if the decision you are seeking to challenge is not eligible for administrative review and you can only apply for AR if the decision you wish to challenge does not carry a right of appeal.

In an immigration appeal, the immigration decision being challenged is first reviewed by the Home Office. If the Home Office decides to maintain its decision then the case will proceed to a hearing before an independent Judge sitting in the First-tier Tribunal (Immigration and Asylum Chamber). The appeal hearing will usually be an oral hearing, at which the parties attend and are legally represented. Witnesses may be called to give evidence and the parties are generally able to submit additional evidence.

Administrative review, meanwhile, is an internal Home Office review process. It involves a paper review of the decision under challenge by a Home Office team that is independent from the team who made the original decision. There is no oral hearing and the circumstances in which new evidence may be submitted are limited.

In an immigration appeal, the Immigration Tribunal will generally reconsider the case in its entirety, although the issue(s) to be determined may be limited by the scope of the Home Office refusal letter, the agreement of the parties and/or directions of the court. The overarching duty of the Tribunal is to fairly determine whether the Home Office decision under challenge breaches the UK's international obligations.

Who Has the Right to Apply for AR?

Not all Home Office decisions can be challenged by way of administrative review. This remedy is only available when an eligible decision has been made.

The following is a non-exhaustive list of the main immigration applications which, if refused by the Home Office, will generate an eligible decision which can be challenged by way of an application for administrative review:

- Tier 1 Investor (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/investor-visas/tier-1-investor-visa-extension/>) (main applicant or dependant);

[illegible]

Some decisions on applications under the EU Settlement Scheme are also eligible decisions which can be challenged by way of an application for administrative review.

If you have made an application which is deemed to be a human rights or protection claim (including asylum (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/human-rights/refugee-protection/>), private life (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/human-rights/human-rights/>), long residence (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/settlement-in-the-uk/long-residence-ilr/>) and Appendix FM family member applications (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/partners-family-visas/>)) or you applied for an EU Settlement Scheme Family Permit (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/eea-nationals-family/eu-settlement-scheme-family-permit/>), then the decision will not be capable of being challenged by way of admin review. However, you may have a right of appeal to the First-tier Tribunal (Immigration and Asylum Chamber) (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/first-tier-tribunal-immigration-appeal/>).

If you have applied as a visitor (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/short-stay-visit-visas/>), then the refusal decision will not be capable of being challenged by way of administrative review. However, you may be able to make a fresh application or apply for judicial review.

Decisions to cancel leave to enter or remain at the UK border due to a change of circumstances, false representations or a failure to disclose material facts are also eligible decisions, provided the result is that you have no leave to enter or remain. This includes decisions to cancel leave to enter or remain which is in force as a visitor.

Your decision letter should state if you can apply for administrative review, but if you are not sure whether your Home Office decision is eligible to be challenged by way of admin review then you may wish to contact our administrative review lawyers in London for further advice.

Grounds for Administrative Review

The only ground for administrative review is that the Home Office has made a permitted case working error, as defined in the Immigration Rules.

What Is a Case Working Error?

Admin review will only consider the following claimed case working errors:

- The Home Office's decision to refuse or cancel entry clearance or leave to enter or remain based on alleged false representations, false documents or information failure to disclose material facts or previous breach of conditions was incorrect;
- The Home Office's decision to refuse an application on the basis that the date of application was beyond a time limit in the Immigration Rules was incorrect;
- The Home Office's decision not to request specified documents (for example, under the points-based system evidential flexibility rules) was incorrect;
- The Home Office decision maker applied the wrong Immigration Rules or otherwise incorrectly applied the Immigration Rules (for example, by failing to consider some or all of the evidence submitted properly);
- The Home Office decision maker failed to apply relevant published policy and guidance in relation to the application (for example, when assessing the credibility or genuineness of the application);
- The Home Office decision maker made an error in calculating the correct period or conditions of immigration leave.

It is possible to apply for administrative review either because the alleged error could have made a difference to the decision or because the alleged error could unfairly impact on a future application (i.e. because a future application may now be refused on general suitability grounds).

The grounds for applying for administrative review are different if you applied to the EU Settlement Scheme (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/eea-nationals-family/>), as a Frontier Worker (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/other-work-visas/frontier-worker-permit/>), as an S2 Healthcare Visitor or as a Service Provider from Switzerland. If this applies to you then contact our leading administrative review lawyers in London for further information.

How to Apply for Administrative Review

Applications for AR must generally be submitted online, in accordance with the requirements of the Immigration Rules.

The administrative review application fee must be paid (unless an exemption applies) and all mandatory sections of the online application form must be completed. Documents specified as mandatory on the online application or in related guidance must be submitted.

If the admin review application is incomplete, it will be rejected. You may wish to seek legal advice from a specialist administrative review lawyer before applying.

The Home Office will not consider any new evidence or information, unless it impacts upon the decision under review and it:

- Proves that you did not practice deception in the application under review, where this was a ground for refusal;

- Proves that there was no change of circumstances, if leave was cancelled at the UK border for this reason; (<https://www.google.co.uk/search?q=immigration+barristers+in+richmond+scotland>)
- Proves that the application was made within a time limit specified in the Immigration Rules, when an alleged failure to apply in-time provided a basis for refusal; or
- Should have been requested by the Home Office when considering points-based system evidential flexibility.

The process of applying for AR is different if you applied to the EU Settlement Scheme (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/eea-nationals-family/>), as a Frontier Worker (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/other-work-visas/frontier-worker-permit/>), as an S2 Healthcare Visitor or as a Service Provider from Switzerland. If this applies to you then contact our leading administrative review lawyers in London for further information.

Time limit for Applying for Admin Review

If you are in the UK and applied for permission to stay from within the UK, you will have 14 calendar days (or 7 days if detained) from the date when you received your decision notice or biometric residence permit to apply for administrative review.

If you are outside the UK and applied from outside the UK, you will need to apply for admin review within 28 days of receiving the decision that you wish to challenge.

Administrative Review Processing Times

Administrative review applications are currently taking at least 6 months to be processed by the Home Office.

Application Fees

The Home Office charges a fee of £80 for an admin review application. There is no additional fee for reviewing the decision(s) in relation to any dependent(s) who were properly included in the original application.

Certain applicants may be exempt from paying the admin review fee, whilst others may qualify for a fee waiver.

To discuss your administrative review application with one of our immigration barristers, contact our immigration law specialists on 0203 617 9173 or complete our enquiry form below.

Immigration Status After Applying for AR

(<https://www.google.co.uk>

If you made an in time application, and applied for administrative review within the time limit for administrative review of the decision, you will continue to have immigration leave until you are served with notice of decision of the admin review.

If you are an overstayer at the point of making a valid administrative review application, the Home Office will not seek to remove you from the United Kingdom while you have an administrative review pending.

Fresh Applications and Administrative Review

If you submit a new application for entry clearance, leave to enter or leave to remain while an application for administrative review is pending, your administrative review application will be treated as withdrawn.

If you submit a fresh application for entry clearance, leave to enter or leave to remain and then apply for administrative review of a previous decision, your administrative review application will be refused.

Possible Outcomes of Administrative Review

There are 4 possible outcomes following an application for administrative review:

- The Home Office agrees that the decision being challenged contains a casework error and the decision is withdrawn;
- The Home Office does not agree that the decision being challenged contains a casework error, the decision remains in force and all reasons given for the decision are maintained;
- The Home Office does not agree that the decision under challenge contains a casework error, the decision remains in force, but one or more reasons given for the decision are withdrawn;
- The Home Office does not agree that the decision under challenge contains a casework error, the decision remains in force, but with different or additional reasons to those given in the decision under review.

What Will Happen if My Review Application Is Successful?

If the Home Office finds that the decision of the original decision maker contained a casework error, then it will go on to consider whether correcting the casework error would change the outcome of the original decision.

If the Home Office is satisfied that the error in the original decision changed the decision, it will withdraw the decision and refund your administrative review fee.

If the Home Office decides to withdraw an incorrect decision then they will normally correct the error and issue a new decision. If the new decision is that the application should have been granted, you will be granted leave that is appropriate to the original application. <https://www.google.co.uk/search?q=immigration+barristers&rlz=1C1GCECHambers+in>

Your leave will start from the date of the withdrawal of the incorrect previous decision. If your administrative review challenged the period of leave granted or conditions of leave, you will be issued with a new BRP.

What Will Happen if My Review Application Is Not Successful?

If the Home Office concludes that the decision made on your visa or immigration application (or the period of leave granted or conditions imposed) was correct then you will receive a notice explaining that the decision under challenge has been maintained.

There is no right of appeal against an administrative review decision and it is not possible to request a second review, unless the result of the first review found new reasons for refusal. In this situation you will be entitled to a further administrative review in relation to the new grounds. Your decision letter should tell you whether you can apply for a second review.

It may be possible to seek judicial review (<https://www.judiciary.uk/how-the-law-works/judicial-review/>) of the outcome of the administrative review. You may wish to seek legal advice from a specialist immigration judicial review (<https://immigrationbarrister.co.uk/personal-immigration/immigration-appeals/immigration-judicial-review/>) lawyer.
